Crucial political decisions in the young American Republic of the late 18th century were made by relatively few leaders. They knew each other personally, and their face-to-face interaction in social contexts had a significant impact on the choices that eventually did. Ellis contrasts Washington, the realist, and Jefferson, "For which ideals were supreme reality and whose inspiration ability derived from his trust that the world would then come around to mount the image he had in his head. The author explores Washington's vision as expressed in his last circular letter as commander in the head of the army in the United States in 1783 and in his goodbye speech by President. It is interesting to note that Washington, in his "Speech to the Cherokee nation, imagined the inclusion of Native Americans in the developing country. And, unlike Jefferson, "he tended to consider the condition of the black population as a product of cultivating rather than nature that is, he saw slavery like the culprit, preventing the development of diligence and responsibility that would be gradually emerged and of course After the emancipation. John Adams is one of the author's favorite characters. "His refreshing and often irreverent candor provides the most clear window in the deeper ambitions and the conflicting vanities that pushed them. Exhibition Ellis like all other political leaders deserted Adams when he became President and Abigail became the one-Woman's staff of him. The author masterfully directs through the Adams Presidency and Abigail and John of reconciliation with Jefferson, who led to their 14-year exchange of letters, today considered the most important correspondence between the first-floor American statistics.
