One of the lucky reality to use the Internet is that there are eyes everywhere. Whether it's internet service providers, governments or websites, many different entities have the opportunity to monitor every move online and find out where you live. In fact, everything they need to do is watch your IP address or access the GPS position of your device. The third-party capacity to keep track of your position is not just a huge privacy concern, but also means that the geo restrictions can also be imposed. As a result of this, some websites, apps and content could be inaccessible in your country or in the region. Obviously, this is not an ideal situation. While VPNs are generally a great way to solve these problems, only hide your IP address and not your GPS position. So you can still be monitored online. But you can easily get around this by setting a false GPS position. As the name suggests, the spoofing position is the use of technology to change the geographical location of the phone, tablet or computer to a fake. For spoofing your position, you will be able to do things how to improve your online privacy, make people believe you are abroad when you actually don't really act, connect with more people on apps apps, watch the latest films and TV programs Streaming platforms and use Pokemon go to all globe corners. In this article, we speak through the reasons why you should pretend your GPS position. With plans that start about 8 cents a day, it's really hard to jump on Surfshark because it's a paid service. It offers a ton of great features you would expect from a VPN supplier and is super simple to use. Start with the spoofing position is quite simple. On Android devices, the fastest way to create a false GPS position is recording on Surfshark, which is the only VPN company that offers this as integrated functionality. So, you will have to download the surfshark app from Google Play Store and access the app settings. When you are in the settings, click the page entitled 'Advanced' and press the 'Override GPS location' button. You will tell you to go to your device settings. Here, open 'About the phone' and click on 'Build number' seven times. Your phone or tablet will now be in a developer mode. While you are still in your device settings, search for "Select Mock-Location App" and press Surfshark from the list of apps that will appear. The process should now be completed and you will be able to push your position. The way the GPS position spoofing works works on Surfshark is that whenever you connect to a different VPN server via the app, even the physical position of the device will change. This will be automatic when you have activated the function in the surfshark app. 1. Change your location to Snapchat Maps as a lot of social networking sites. Snapchat accesses the GPS information of your users to be able to offer a range of different features. In particular, Snapchat maps make extensive use of this technology. The latter is an optional function that allows you to see where your friends are and what they are doing on an interactive map. If you want to make sure that your friends believe you believe to sunbathe on a Caribbean beach or skiing in the French Alps, the spoofing location is quite useful (although in a fun way). It is also great for higher activity as you access Snapchat's functionality and filters that are not available where you live. How to use Surfshark to spoler your position at Snapchat 2. Capture Pokemon all over the world Pokemon Go is another app that is perfect for the position of the spoofing, as it is effectively powered by GPS. If you live à €
