Nowadays, all in information systems (Å ©) are talking about object-oriented technology - known as "oo" for their affaird. The enthusiasm about Oo reached the main press (Hammonds, 1991) and executives are listening to successful stories about dramatic productivity gains and "Lego Blocks" (Hammonds, 1991). Inside it is, some people are talking about a "revolution" Oo that will change drastically as is their work and that has the potential to eliminate or reduce significantly is functional. All this hype is putting the managers under pressure to enter the Bandwagon. Once again, managers are being asked to take chronic decisions about not proven technology. On the one hand, it is actively looking for new ways to improve its quality and productivity. On the other hand, managers know of bitter experiences the problems and costs of introducing a new technology. This article attempts to look critically, besides Hype, in the current state of OO technology to identify the problems that managers should face decision making on your organizations. To explore and evaluate what organizations are doing with OO technology, the authors called a focus of seniors are managers of ten main Canadian companies representing five industrial sectors: retail, manufacture , banks, communications and insurance. Group members were invited to talk about their current meetings with OO, the benefits and problems they have experienced to today, and other issues that are dealing around the introduction of OO technology into their organizations. This article first gives a brief general vision of OO technology and its relationship with other technologies. Then evaluate the main benefits and problems that organizations can expect in the introduction and use of OO. Finally, this tries to answer some key issues on how and when to introduce OO into an organization.bassett, P. G. (1990). "Perspectives on software re-use", Case Tenders, July / August.Bozman, J. S.
