HTML <form> element attributes

In HTML there are various attributes available for <form> element which are given below:

HTML action attribute

The action attribute of <form> element defines the process to be performed on form when form is submitted, or it is a URL to process the form information.

The action attribute value defines the web page where information proceed. It can be .php, .jsp, .asp, etc. or any URL where you want to process your form.

How to pass php variable value to action attribute of html form. In an html form what attribute specifies a default value for an input field. Add an action attribute to the form element with the value index.html. How to pass javascript variable value to action attribute of html form.

The following example shows how the contents of a user-specified file may be submitted with a form. bottom: The legend is at the bottom of the fieldset. The actual key sequence that causes tabbing navigation or element activation depends on the configuration of the user agent (e.g., the "tab" key is used for navigation and the "enter" key is used to activate a selected element). submit Creates a submit button. A form can contain text and markup (paragraphs, lists, etc.) in addition to form controls. This control type is often used for sensitive input such as passwords. This example creates a table that is used to align two text input controls and their associated labels. A control's "control name" is given by its name attribute. left: The legend is at the left side of the fieldset. The default value for this attribute is an unlimited number. Attributes defined elsewhere id, class (document-wide identifiers) lang (language information), dir (text direction) title (element title) style (inline style information) disabled (disabled input controls) onclick, ondblclick, onmousedown, onmouseup, onmouseover, onmousemove, onmouseout, onkeypress, onkeydown, onkeyup (intrinsic events) When rendering a menu choice, user agents should use the value of the label attribute of the OPTION element as the choice. If none of the elements of a set of radio buttons specifies 'CHECKED', then the user agent must check the first radio button of the set initially. The remaining components are not pre-selected. 17.11.2 Access keys Attribute definitions accesskey = character [CN] This attribute assigns an access key to an element. Step one: Identify the successful controls Step two: Build a form data set A form data set is a sequence of control-name/current-value pairs constructed from successful controls Step three: Encode the form data set The form data set is then encoded according to the content type specified by the enctype attribute of the FORM element. Note. Visual user agents may render BUTTON buttons with relief and an up/down motion when clicked, while they may render INPUT buttons as "flat" images. The client must interpret this list as an exclusive-or list, i.e., the server is able to accept any single character encoding per entity received. value = cdata [CA] This attribute specifies the initial value of the control. 17.13 Form submission The following sections explain how user agents submit form data to form processing agents. Thus, for example, checkboxes allow users to select several values for the same property. This specification does not specify all valid submission methods or content types that may be used with forms. The user agent should attempt to supply a file name for each submitted file. If the server takes different actions depending on the location clicked, users of non-graphical browsers will be disadvantaged. The LEGEND element allows authors to assign a caption to a FIELDSET. This specification includes more detailed information about forms in the subsections on form display issues. If no radio button in a set sharing the same control name is initially "on", user agent behavior for choosing which control is initially "on" is undefined. Please consult the section on form submission for information about how user agents should handle expected responses. When specified, user agents should use the value of this attribute rather than the content of the OPTION element as the option label. It is divided into three sections: personal information, medical history, and current medication. The INPUT element is used to create a radio button control. For this reason, authors should consider alternate approaches: Use multiple submit buttons (each with its own image) in place of a single graphical submit button. If multiple files are to be returned as the result of a single form entry, they should be returned as "multipart/mixed" embedded within the "multipart/form-data". If the method is "post" and the action is an HTTP URI, the user agent conducts an HTTP "post" transaction using the value of the action attribute and a message created according to the content type specified by the enctype attribute. When the submit button is activated, the form will be sent to the program specified by the action attribute. Each section contains controls for inputting the appropriate information. ...some more... The only way to modify dynamically the value of the disabled attribute is through a script. Behavior for other content types is unspecified. Suppose we have the following form:
